THE GREAT REGRESSION

Edited by
HEINRICH GEISELBERGER

(2017).
In the last couple of years, attacks on Slavoj Žižek multiply from different sources. Politically, he was condemned for his position on Donald Trump, for his critique of the humanitarian approach to refugees, for his more nuanced approach to LGBT+ movement, etc. In the space of psychoanalysis, Lacanians around Jacques-Alain Miller started a ferocious campaign against Žižek, denouncing him as a fraud. In the space of philosophy, new forms of realism ("object-oriented-ontology") reject Žižek's thought as still rooted in transcendental subjectivity. Attacks on Žižek are often characterized by an almost unheard-of personal brutality (Chomsky, the campaign to "erase" Žižek from public space), and they are also accompanied by Žižek's growing exclusion from public media - one can no longer read his comments and columns in LRB, Guardian, In These Times, etc.

Instead of getting caught in petty personal exchanges, the question should be raised: which are the real stakes of this ongoing conflict? What does it imply philosophically and politically? The idea is to invite Žižek's colleagues and his critics to engage with different aspects of the emergence of Žižek as a problematic and divisive figure, and then to allow Žižek himself to reply to the collected texts. Such an issue of IJZS could play a very important role since it will render visible the main antagonisms that traverse today's philosophy and Leftist thought.

Should you be interested in submitting a paper please quote “CFP: WHAT WENT WRONG WITH ŽIŽEK?” and send Abstract to the IJZS.

Žižek suggests the cruciform combination of two axes: “universality versus patriotic belonging” and “capitalism versus leftist anti-capitalism”...
